Many cases of X Everywhere can be seen as an indicator of new trends, while some should be considered as a complaint or complaint against them, depending on the context. The Origin Of the Contour Drawing by Buzz and Woody was originally taken from the House Dialogue scene in Toy Story 2: How a macro image. X, X EVERYWHERE had its origins on the 420chan imageboard in 2007, when Kirtaner, one of the site's administrators, implemented a wordfilter that would automatically fill any text-less image posts with the phrase DICKS EVER. Although it was designed to rein some users away from the spam board with, other users soon began posting variations of X Everywhere, replacing Dix with a word more relevant to image attachments. In literature as a rhetorical device, X, X Everywhere has an uncertain origin. The earliest known imprint of the phrase can be found in the second part of Rings of the Ancient Navigator, written by the English poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge and first published in 1798: Water, water, everywhere, and all the boards really compressed; Water, water, everywhere, not a drop to drink. The amazing Spider-Man Long Runs and the incredibly popular comic the Amazing Spider-Man recently referenced this meme in the current spidey Spider-Island saga, written by Dan Slott as the title of the fourth chapter of the saga in The Amazing Spider-Man #670. The spread of Google search queries for Dicks Everywhere has been visible since the 420chan wordfilter episode in July 2007, but the phrase really caught on with 4chan demographics years later in July 2010, around the same time Toy Story 3 was released in theaters.
